Introduction

Welcome to the tenth edition of The Date-A-Base Book!

As always, every entry has been cross-checked with Encyclopaedia Britannica, official websites and other sources. This is not an easy process as there's an awful lot of 'disinformation' out there, and it's definitely getting worse. Whenever there was doubt – which there frequently was – we've tried to go back to the original source. Even so, we advise you to double-check each entry before using it, and satisfy yourself that it is 100% correct. If you come across any mistakes please let us know.

We'll post any corrections we hear about on the official ideas4writers blog:
<http://ideas4writers.wordpress.com>

As far as possible, and where appropriate, we've used New Style (NS) dates from the Gregorian calendar.

Celebrities are notorious for knocking a few years off their ages. Wherever possible we've given both their real and claimed dates of birth, and noted which is which. Similarly, they don't always go by their real names, so we've used the names by which they are most commonly known. Their real names can easily be found in Encyclopaedia Britannica, Wikipedia, and other sources.

With such a vast number of worthy people to choose from, we elected to list only those who are included in Encyclopaedia Britannica, or those we've definitely heard of. We apologise if a few non-British household names didn't make the final cut.

We have generally not included living people, except for royalty and heads of state.

It was not possible to include every significant event from every war. We've chosen what we think are the main ones, but if we've left out something that you think should have been included please let us know.

We used the currency exchange rates that were in effect on 31st July 2015.

How to use this book

The Ann. column gives the anniversary of each entry, so 400 means the 400th anniversary of that event. The date on which the event took place is listed next, followed by a brief description.

The most obvious way to use this book is to choose the entries that interest you, then write news reports, newspaper and magazine articles, short stories, novels, essays, stage plays, screenplays, poems, jokes, non-fiction books, guidebooks, biographies, TV/ radio features, and so on about them.

But how about thinking outside the box? For example, you might try to see the event through the eyes of someone who was there at the time. Or think about how the world might have been different if that person hadn't been born or had done something else, or if an event hadn't taken place, or if it had happened in a different way or at a different time. You could also use an event, or a series of them, as background detail in a novel or screenplay. Have your characters think about the events, and talk about them. Perhaps they could influence an event, or be influenced by it.

What most editors, publishers, broadcasters and producers are looking for is something original; something that hasn't been done before. They don't (necessarily) want the same old summary of a person's life, or a potted history and timeline of an event. They can probably write that in-house anyway, using their own staff writers – though it's always worth making an enquiry just in case. But you'll probably have more success if you provide them with something different, more compelling, a new angle; something that ties in with the date of the event, but which can run alongside the more general features.

If you're writing about a person, don't just focus on his accomplishments; have a look at the other things going on in his life: problems, interests, hobbies, associations, relatives and relationships, fans, and so on. See if you can tie that in with one of your own areas of interest – you probably already read publications and visit websites related to that interest, so that's a good first market to aim for.

See if you can relate the item to something from your own life, or use it as a trigger to set off a series of memories and reminiscences that could lead to a new writing project. If you haven't written much before, or have never had anything published, try using the item as a starting point and write a letter about it to the editor of your local newspaper or your favourite magazine. Then see if you can get the coveted 'star letter' slot. Once you've achieved that, move on to other things such as short articles.

Don't limit yourself to printed publications. There are plenty of online publications that need writers, and some of them will even pay you. And don't limit yourself to your own country – there's a whole world out there that's interested in what you have to say.

Timing is important too, of course. You need to start work well in advance of the anniversary, so that your finished piece of writing appears in print – or on stage or screen – at exactly the right time. Most magazines work several months in advance, and if you're writing for the stage or screen you might need to have your script ready more than a year before the anniversary occurs. So you should look at getting the next edition of The Date-A-Base Book as soon as it becomes available!

You could make a very good career out of writing anniversary-based articles. You'll find lots more information in our book Ditch Your Day Job! - the easiest way to make a living as a writer. You can download it for free from our website (www.ideas4writers.co.uk). If you have friends who talk about wanting to write but their work keeps getting in the way, you might like to tell them about it.
